1. [redacted] Soviet Border Troops [redacted] were distinguished from the regular Soviet army personnel by a small green patch appearing on the right collar of their uniform. [redacted] these Border troops in Frunze in 1946 when officers of the organization came to the college for concerts [redacted] they no longer wore the identifying green patch on their uniform. The Border Troops are an exclusive, carefully selected, and highly regarded organization which is quite popular among the Soviet youth, who endeavor to be chosen for this service. The Troopers are usually native to the area and highly trusted individuals who are held strictly accountable for the border area which they patrol. Each trooper is required to maintain a diary containing detailed information of all events and individuals encountered while on patrol, and this record may be checked by his superiors at any time to verify activity on his sector of the frontier. The Border Troops are stationed at close intervals along all frontiers, the area of their patrol being limited to a few hundred feet in many instances. In the contingent of Border Troops on the Soviet-Polish frontier in 1939, [redacted] a large number of NKVD soldiers [redacted]

2. The headquarters for the Border Troops in Frunze was located in the northern portion of the city surrounded by living quarters for the officers and enlisted men. [redacted] no idea as to the number of Border Troopers stationed in Frunze but there were a great many during the war years and an even larger supply appeared for the May Day parade in 1946. The headquarters in Frunze were reportedly responsible for Border Troop operations for the entire Central Asia district as was also true of the Secret Police or NKVD organizations in the city. Some of the Border Troops stationed in Frunze were dispatched to the Far East front and the Western European front during World War II, and in 1946 the troopers from the latter battle areas were beginning to return in numbers.
